Creating that perfect combination of several elements into one cohesive piece requires several tweaks to the different layers in the sequence. Keeping track of what elements are where, and hidden layers with different effects, can be complicated and time consuming. With the new Frame Sequencer feature, now no longer limited to a sub-menu in After Effects, one can simply control layers by adding them to the frame(s) that they are in. With the click of a button, one can connect and animate those layers together, and synchronize clips and effects. Bringing forward some of the most complex animations is easy. For example, in the previous demo, a single undo action was created to transform a star shape, a color swatch of a particular color, and a preset blurred and faded clip.
