Let's be clear about one thing. Stick with Photoshop for, at a bare minimum, the foreseeable future. It beats the pants off of iPhoto (even though most people don't realize Apple still produces it) and Cropping Plus as a whole is even better than the bulk of my iPhoto library saved as JPEGs. (Read my Apple iPhone 7 screen-time review..) That being said, Photoshop Elements can't compete with Photoshop in terms of functionality. If you need to edit RAW or other non-JPEG files, you need Photoshop. If you can't afford or don't need a huge fleet of apps to handle just about anything in photography and video, iPhoto, Music, and Photo Stream are still some of the better photo-editing alternatives you're going to find. In every comparison I just offered of the various photo-editing apps, Photoshop himself comes out on top. It still leads the pack in terms of functionality, but it also leads in terms of performance. It's so fast that opening a new project and importing an image (even just to see it and commit it to memory) can take as long as getting the media card into the computer. I am almost 100% natural in front of a keyboard and mouse. It's hard to imagine how I would manage to do any real work without them. And yet, there are times when I'm curious to see how I'd fare if I were forced to work without either for a little while. Whether you're a photographer or a graphic designer, you might be surprised at how quickly your workflow starts to feel clumsy if you have to switch your tools to the iPad Pro's on-screen keyboard. If you are using Photoshop for creative work, it's almost certainly the case that creating new files (stencils) is something you may have done on a regular basis, at least once or twice a week. Anyway, here's how you can get creating on the iPad Pro.
