I could then use the clone tool to create a clone layer of the image. This layer would become the final background layer for the image adjustments. I could move the clone layer to get the tissue texture I wanted. I could then use the healing brush to soften the image, blend the edges, and bring back some of the highlights from the subject's face. If I needed to, I could remove the clone and revert back to the visible background. The Healing Brush, Clone Stamp, and Airbrush tools can all be used to help you make modifications in the image. Those options are personalizable, so for example, you can select from a list of preset brushes and slides. The brush tool is easy to use, but it takes practice to make retouching work. This is because the pixels are added to the active layer. I found that I needed to "load" the active layer (by holding command and clicking the eye icon over the active layer), and then I used the brush tool to paint my corrections. Once the "load" is repainting the image, it cleans itself and I can start over, reducing the number of steps needed to make a good-looking retouch. I also worked with the healing and clone tools. I tried to mimic the texture on the light-colored bread by cloning a piece of the dark-colored bread, and then using the blending mode Refine Edge to bring out the edges of that clone layer. The white highlight bleeds into the entire image because of the small white area of the two bread slices. So I added a filler color and used the healing brush to blend the top portion and bottom portions together.
